Introduction

American Law Enforcement has undergone an extensive transition during the past forty years. Changes in the social, educational, political, and economic paradigms in both the United States and globally have effected the policies and operational procedures of our police force on all levels. From a time when Police Officers combated a manageable crime rate armed with nothing more than a simple firearm and walkie-talkie, to a time of incredible increases in criminal activity resulting in the new era of Law Enforcement we see today. The modern Police Officer, armed with computerized patrol vehicles, sophisticated weapons systems, state-of-the-art communications, space-age ballistic armor, forensic science, etc., remains poised to confront acts of violence and terrorism which appear to have become a way of life for our society. While the battle against this new threat of violent crime and terrorism may at times seem uncontrollable, the threat can be managed and reduced. However, accomplishing this task will require our law enforcement community to embrace and take advantage of the modern technology available to meet the challenge head-on.

The new police paradigm requires an officer that is extremely knowledgeable and physically capable of confronting this new threat in a professional, systematic manner with both aggressiveness and restraint. Education and training should be of primary concern in Law Enforcement today. Police Officers must understand these rapidly changing social, political, and technological norms which ultimately become the foundation of the law they enforce. Today the Internet is a place where just such an understanding can be found. The World Wide Web is an easily accessible global information exchange containing the best in both good and evil from all areas of our knowledge base.

This manual was designed to function as a gateway to the vast amount of Law Enforcement related information available on today's Internet. It contains an extensive listing of Internet web sites divided into 37 sections of interest to Law Enforcement Officers. Whether your researching information regarding police training, terrorism, computer crime, forensic science, gangs, government or police agencies, news, professional associations, equipment, etc. there are resources listed. While not a complete listing of all available Law Enforcement web sites available on the Internet, it is however a very comprehensive resource that should increase your research ability dramatically. We also urge all users to investigate the links sections of the web sites listed. The combination of which will result in thousands of web sites containing research information of use to the Police Officer.

Fundamentals of Internet Research

Within any response-oriented field, research is often the underlying key in obtaining valuable information, such as statistical queries, reports, opinions, case studies and more. The Internet has taken research to a new frontier, making it not only easier, but also faster and more comprehensive than ever before. Understanding the basics in Internet searching can provide the user with a wider spectrum of results, thus increasing the validity of any research project, no matter the size.

Obtaining information using the Internet is accomplished by using browsers or software programs that take input from the user and conduct automatic searches of the literally millions of Internet Web Sites available. Performing these searches manually, or by going to web sites one by one, is not only tedious, but virtually impossible due to the fact that not all information is stored on web sites that are easily obtainable without knowing the specific address. Therefore, using browsers takes the majority of the “legwork” and brings the user that much closer to obtaining the goal.

There are essentially two things a user needs to conduct research on the Internet; a computer with a connection to an Internet Service Provider or ISP and a browser. Two of the more well known browsers are Microsoft® Internet Explorer (www.microsoft.com) and Netscape® Navigator (www.netscape.com). Most computers come with either one or the other pre-installed. It is highly recommended to update to the latest versions of your browser to make use of new technology and features.

Once a connection to the Internet has been established, the user connects to a variety of search engines (see the search engine directory section) and begins inputting their queries to obtain results. The results that are returned can number in the thousands, so it is important to know how the search engines or directories work, as well as how to pose your question.

For the purpose of a basic understanding of inputting requests, the most common method is using “keywords”.

Keywords are single words or groups of words that are used to match up with text in existing web pages or directory structures contained within a site.

Although some Internet search engines rely on various methods of conducting searches, using keywords is almost a given in all of them.

Search engines that utilize keyword searches span the web pages within their directory or search the Internet for web pages containing the words in the html code. Other engines might simply search for the keywords in the document itself.

The use of keywords does not have to be limited to one word, or even the correct spelling, due to the large number of web sites that accommodate common user mistakes. A well-authored web page will have within its keyword listing, misspelled variations of the words someone might look for. Even if the web page was not authored for keyword use, the search engine might find the words in any number of pages within a particular web site.

Keyword searching is not as specific as using sentences or proper names; therefore, the result given to you may not completely reflect what you are looking for. For example, if you are searching for information on an Emergency Response website, and you type in “emergency” or “response” as your keyword, you will see results returned to you on every possible web site that the search engine found that contains those words in it. Where as the results might be overwhelming, in some cases 50,000 or more pages, generally what you are searching for is displayed within the first 30 or so topics. One very important aspect of searching is that each time you find a site that may contain a few pieces of information of interest to you; it will most likely also contain its’ own links section. Links, meaning clickable addresses to other web sites. Most links pages within web sites are target specific to that subject, or categorized among different subjects. This affords the user another medium of searching, and is a tool to refine a search even further.

Using such generalized methods as keywords enables the user to open the search wide enough to find information on otherwise specific or nondescript topics, or pages that were perhaps not authored for easy searching. A general rule of thumb for picking the proper keywords to use is to start with the most obvious ones first, and then get more specific as needed. Getting specific will reduce the number of returns you get, and can cut through unrelated sites quicker. Some topics simply have to be searched with general keywords or phrases and then sorted through until the desired return is found. Currently, there is a seemingly endless assortment of information within the Emergency Response and Law Enforcement field, this is mostly due to the fact that people within these fields are more group oriented and interaction with the general public is just now beginning to take place. Whereas this information was at once time fairly kept within the groups “inner circle” the Internet is opening the gates and allowing anyone to find such information. What this means to the research that someone might be conducting is that until this information finds its’ niche on the Internet, it will be found sporadically without a predefined list or basic concept in place.

Some search sites offer directories of categorized information. Conducting a search within these sites returns information contained on that site, not on the Internet as a whole. These sites usually contain subject menus with sub-menus beneath. Utilizing that type of resource usually consists of picking a subject category and clicking through to underlying topics. All the top search engines and directories have information on their site about how to conduct a proper search using their tools. It is advisable and time effective to look at this information until you are comfortable using search tools. Comprehension of the basics will lead to not only informative research, but a more enjoyable experience and increased skill in finding the information quickly.
